Cycles of Reform? A Summary of Trends Since World War II

Much of our lives are dominated by cycles. Some come from the basic celestial mechanics of the solar system: night and day, lunar tides, the annual seasons. Others are social conventions: weeks and weekends, monthly billings, annual repetitions of holidays and other customs. Cycles are even genetically engineered into our bodies. The female reproductive and wake/sleep cycles are the most obvious examples. Given the prominence of these natural and social cycles, it is not surprising that people have searched for and posited cyclical patterns in many other aspects of life.

One large group of cyclical theories are those that apply cycles to history. At one extreme are various cosmological cycles of existence such as the Aztec beliefs about the successive birth and destruction of previous worlds (Cairns, 1962 and Ross, 1975). Somewhat more modest and more based on observation than the cosmological theories are growth-and-decay theories that posit an organic life cycle for civilizations and nations (Spengler, 1926-28 and Toynbee, 1947-1957). Downright maidenly by comparison are various theories of historical cycles within countries and societies. It is with these theories that we will mainly deal.

Two major types of cyclical theories have been posited for the United States: economic and political. The economic cycles are best known and well established with data and theory (Burns and Mitchell, 1946; Burns, 1965). The most prominent of these is the basic business cycle, the rhythmic repetition of expansions and contractions which have characterized the United States and other industrial, free market economies since the early 1800s. From 1854 to 1961 these cycles averaged 49 months with extremes from 17 months to 101 months. As one can see by the dispersion of cycle lengths, the business cycles are not rigidly periodic such as the solar and calendar cycles. The business cycle is internally driven by the complex interaction of economic forces. Neither its timing nor magnitude is simply or precisely fixed. In particular it can be disrupted by exogenous shocks such as wars (as could even solar cycles given some great cosmic catastrophe). Despite these irregularities, the business cycle is a powerful force in shaping short-term economic conditions. In addition, changes in various social conditions from the marriage rate to alcohol consumption have been related to the business cycle (Thomas, 1925 and Sorokin, 1928). Besides the basic business cycle other economic cycles exist for particular sectors such as construction and longer general cycles such as the Kuznets cycles of major and minor business cycles (wheel within wheels!) and more conjectural Kondratieff cycles lasting over 50 year periods have been advanced.

Political cycles are generally much less established than economic cycles. Certain cycles are well known. National elections of course fall every two years. While this pattern is not surprising and perhaps uninteresting since it is a simple function of constitutional mandate (Article I, Sections 2 and 5; Article II, Sections 1; and Amendment 17), it dramatically influences political activity, media coverage, and even the economy (Tufte, 1978). In addition to this mechanical regularity there are the well-established patterns of voter turnout increasing for presidential elections and falling for mid-term elections and the loss of the president's party of House seats during mid-term elections (Campbell, 1960 and Tufte, 1975).

Covering a longer time span are the realignment/maintaining election cycle and the succession of party systems. V.O. Key (1955; 1959) first noted that American history was marked by a series of critical elections in which new partisan coalitions were forged. These coalitions and the electoral division of the voters tended to maintain themselves through successive elections until a new critical election and realignment occurred. Key's model has been expanded, modified, and refined by later authors (primarily by adding the concept of deviating elections to denote temporary electoral reverses of the dominant party based on personalities or other transitory factors rather than an enduring realignment). Key and most other early writers on realignment (MacRae and Meldrum, 1960; Campbell, Converse, Miller and Stokes, 1966) did not discuss the repeating nature of realignments and therefore did not consider cyclical explanations. Starting with Sellers (1965), however, most authors (Pomper, 1967; Jahnige, 1970; Burnham, 1970; Andersen, 1979; Petrocik, 1981; Hamburg, 1982) described this political pattern as a cycle. Two main explanations have been offered for the repetition. The change/disequilibrium model most fully articulated by Burnham (1970) argues that social and economic change builds up a backlog of problems that can not be handled by the existing party system. Either the new problems are crosscutting issues which the parties find difficult to handle because of the intra-party divisions or the problems simply represent topics that the existing party leadership is unconcerned about or unfamiliar with and therefore fails to handle. Eventually, the accumulation of new problems forces a rupture in the existing electorial system and a new alignment of issues, groups, and parties is formed. These new groups will then deal with the unresolved problems, but will eventually be overcome by future problems with which they will be unable to cope.

The second explanation, the mobilized political generation model, argues that realignments are basically the result of a large number of new voters being mobilized to vote for a new leader/party (Andersen, 1979; Petrocik, 1981; Hamburg, 1982; Baker, 1985). Once this group is motivated to vote and establishes a habit of voting for the dominant party, they continue to follow their partisan voting throughout their lives. Over time, however, the mobilized cohort ages and dies off. They are fairly successful in passing on their partisan affiliation to their children, but these children inherit the party label without the intensity of attachment that their mobilized parents felt. Thus realignment is a period effect that creates a political generation and this generation eventually passes on. With the generation of intense partisans in gradual numerical decline, the population is once again open to a realignment. These two models are not mutually exclusive and one might argue that the passing of the mobilized political generation eases the way for the realignment necessitated by the combination of social change and political inertia.

When realignment occurs, there is usually an accompanying change in the party system, such as the demise of the Federalists and Whigs and the rise of the Republicans. This is not inevitable however. As in in the case of the New Deal realignment, parties can change their coalitions and their positions as dominant and secondary party without leading to the demise of one of the parties or even a basic turnover of their leadership. 1

While political scientists have been advancing the realignment/maintaining election cycle, historians have been advocating a somewhat similar political cycle, a cycle of reform. Historians have long noted that there have been alternating periods of reform and reaction in American history.

Some historians have merely described the alternating periods without suggesting that a repetitive pattern was involved and have offered particularistic explanations for each of the successive rises and falls (Goldman, 1952; Hofstadter, 1955). Another group headed by the Schlesingers (Schlesinger, 1939; 1949; Schelisinger, Jr., 1980; 1984; Faulkner, 1939; Carleton, 1948; Forcey, 1961; Reichley, 1971; Mitchell, 1983), have explicitly argued that these alternating periods form a cycle. (Closely related to these general cycles of reform models are models of student activism that certain sociologists have studied (Altbach, 1974; Levine, 1980; Hoge, Luna, and Miller, 1981.)

¹ As political scientists and others who have been looking for the next realignment to occur since the mid-1960's begin to despair over its coming, two schools of thought have developed that suggest that the realignment cycle is a historic phenomena and no longer operational. One school argues that the party system has weakened to such as extent that no realignment comparable to those of the Civil War, 1890s, or New Deal can occur. They believe that dealignment is occuring instead (Burnham, 1970 and Ladd, 1980). A second school believes that parties and governments have become more attuned to public needs and desires and respond to them as they occur. This should eliminate the need for the kind of political gridlock that triggers realignments (Burnstein, 1984).

Even the advocates of the cycle of reform model have been hard pressed to identify the dynamic that drives the cycle. The most common explanation is organic, that society, like an animal, has a natural alteration between periods of rest and action (Schlesinger, 1939; 1949; Carleton, 1948; and especially Schelisinger, Jr., 1980). The authors describe the public as becoming fatigued or worn-out by reform and then resting until restored energy or boredom pushes society into a new reform surge. Others offer an institutional fossilization model (Schlesinger, 1949; Mitchell, 1983). They argue that once the reform movement wins it begins to switch its energies from idealism and change to maintaining power, administration, and defending its record. The problem with this theory is that it is hard to reconcile with the rest/action model. If reform movements peter out and become lethargic, then why would one have to turn to conservatives for quietude and a respite? Finally, numerous authors (Schlesinger, 1949; Reichley, 1970; Forcey, 1961) mention the role of great leaders in the rise of reform movements. None however explain why such leaders would appear periodically. Actually, if we accept the appearance of great, innovative leaders as a consequence of a reform movement's ascendency--as being called forth by the times, then we might see great leaders as a natural part of the reform cycle, but as an effect not a cause. Finally, two possible causes for reform cycles have been considered, but rejected. The succession of generations is found lacking since the length of generations (i.e., the average time it takes for half the adult population to turnover) has nearly doubled over the last two centuries, but cycles have been vary stable around 16-17 years throughout this period (Schlesinger, 1939; 1949). Also, authors have been unable to identify any simple association between the business cycle and reform movements (Schlesinger, 1949).

The cycle of reform historians further believe that there is a strong progressive element in the oscillations. The periods of reform move society upwards in a liberal direction while the periods of reaction generally accept the reforms of the previous reformist surge. As a result, each reactionary period is essentially a plateau and each liberal period an upward incline. This of course fits in with the rest/action explanation of the reform cycle. Because liberalism moves forward during periods of reform and basically holds its own during reactions, society moves upward in a liberal direction. Each reform surge and each reactionary respite are higher than their respective prior counterpart. Three slight variations of this basic model are graphed in Figure 1.

The theory of reform cycles is attractive because of the analogies to such well-known cycles as night-and-day and the seasons and because it helps to explain the intricate meanderings of history. Yet in none of the literature is there anything close to proof that true repetitive cycles exist (as have been provided for the business cycle for example). One of the key tests of a valid scientific hypothesis is its ability to predict behavior. Using the observed length of reform cycles through 1931, Schlesinger in 1939 predicted a conservative phase starting in 1947 or 1948 and then in 1949 predicted:

We may expect the recession from liberalism which began in 1947 to last till 1962, with a possible margin of a year or two in one direction or the other. The next conservative epoch will then be due around 1978.

While not amounting to proof of a law of politics, three solid predictions in a row recommend further study of the reform cycle model.

To explore the reform cycle theory we examined 335 time trends during the post World War II period that involved questions that tapped the liberal/conservative continuum. (For details of the selection of these questions see Smith, 1982.) As Table 1 documents, on abortions, race relations, sexual morality, tolerance of social and political deviants, women's rights, and other topics support for liberalism increased. Overall 51 percept of the time series showed some shift in the liberal direction, 29 percent had a conservative tilt, and the remaining 20 percent were either constant or bounced around showing no net direction. Liberal and conservative trends both averaged 1.4% per annum, but liberal trends had a slightly stronger linear association with time (an average r^2 with time of .62 for liberal trends and .54 for conservative trends).

This liberal edge was not constant throught the post World War II period. While we do not currently have enough time trends to study in detail changes before 1960, we can compare trends before and after the early 1970s. A preliminary analysis of items that have readings both before and after the early seventies showed less liberal movement in the seventies and eighties than earlier. Nearly 90% of items with a liberal trend for the entire time series showed a lower slope in the seventies and eighties than earlier. Yet the seventies did not see a wholesale reversal of previous liberal gains. Very few trends reversed direction from the liberal to the conservative.

The two most common patterns were 1) for liberal trends to continue, but at a slower pace and 2) for liberal trends to be replaced with constant, no change trends. Figure 2 shows two racial trends that slowed their liberal advance (RACSCHOL - favoring one school system for all races and RACPRES - willingness to vote for a black president), one that seems to have reached a liberal plateau (RACMAR - opposing state laws prohibiting racial intermarriage), and one that is still moving upwards at an undiminished pace (RACSEG - neighborhood open housing). In Figure 3 we see examples of abortion and tolerance trends that further illustrate the shift from liberal trends to constant, no change patterns.

Overall this pattern fits the reform cycle model very well. There is a general liberal advancement and the conservative period is marked more by the slowing of liberal growth rather than by the reversal of liberal trends into a conservative direction.

The data also indicate that change was not uniform in all areas. In the areasof social control, anti-communism, religious attachment and beliefs, and, to a lesser extent, government spending there have been conservative trends. In other areas such as abortion and civil liberties there has been an end to liberal growth, but no conservative movement. Finally, in several areas (especially racial tolerance and feminism) support for liberal positions has continued to increase. These differences reflect the diversity of topics that we have hung on the liberal-conservative continuum. Students of the business cycle have long noted that particular industries will competely skip certain business cycles, go throughout the cycle especially early or late, or have much greater (or smaller) swings than the economy as a whole. These deviations from the general pattern are common and are due to special circumstances impacting on these industries. These deviations from the general pattern are of course of interest, but so is the general pattern itself.

Since our data, like Schlesinger's three predictions, seem to support the reform cycle model, we should continue to examine this hypothesis. One way is to extend the time series back into the Eisenhower years when a similar conservative period existed. While poll trends from the period prior to the mid-1960s are much skimpier than in more recent years, we have identified enough additional time series to move our analysis back to the forties with some precision. Second, modelling the changes in the time series to explain the individual and aggregate level forces that have fueled the trends (and particularly changes in the trends) would be important. In particular the application of cohort-education models should identify the role that political generations have played in the process. Finally, we should start to give more detailed attention to the mechanisms that may drive the periodicity in the reform movements. Consider the four following factors which have been offered by various authors as explanations for periodical, political patterns:

- An alteration of rest and action natural to humans and perhaps the movements and societies they create.
- 2. The accumulation of problems which cannot be handled in a steady, incremental fashion, but must be resolved in reformist surges.
- 3. The succession of political generations.
- 4. Societal equilibrium reform movements eventually go too far and conservatives stand pat too long. The rational desires of the public keep moving both back towards some long term trend line that is established by basic socio-economic changes in society.

Whether one of these, some combination, or other factors accounts for a cycle of reform is unknown. We do not know if there's a real cycle to explain. But by developing these and possibly other theories and framing appropriate tests of their validity, we will be able to advance our understanding of history and social change in general and perhaps discover whether there are cycles of reform.
